Preface

This directory contains an alphabetical list of Nova Scotia fish processors, as of July 1982, who are interested in Canadian and international markets.

The Province of Nova Scotia is the easternmost mainland Province of Canada with a population of 859,400. Halifax, the capital city, is the financial, commercial and academic center of the Atlantic Region of Canada.

Nova Scotia is idealy situated to harvest the rich fisheries resource of the Northwest Atlantic. Historically, these fishing grounds were known and exploited even before the time of the original settlers in the early 1500's. Since that time, the fishery has been the economic thrust of Nova Scotia. Today, with Canadian control of the resource and conservation-oriented management measures in place, increased landings are assured and the future of the fishery is bright.

For the past four years, Canada has been the world's largest exporter of seafood products, and all indications show that it will continue to lead. In terms of both landed weight and value, Nova Scotia is one of the leading provinces approaching nearly 30 per cent of total Canadian fishery exports. Nova Scotia fish landings are now on the verge of 500 thousand metric tonnes and a final product value of one half billion dollars. Few fishing areas of the world can offer as much diversity of species and processed products as Nova Scotia. The leading species in terms of landed value include scallops, cod, lobster, haddock and herring. Mackerel, eels, bluefish, tuna, crab, shrimp, clams and a variety of groundfish are also important species to the Nova Scotia fishing industry.

With proper resource management, future indications are for increased landings of groundfish, particularly cod, and a more gradual long-term growth in the landings of other species. With the abundance of other species such as squid and silver hake off the Nova Scotia Coast, domestic and export markets are now being established.

Throughout Nova Scotia, especially in the coastal communities, the fishery is a major employer. There are over 11,400 fishermen and 5,000 processing plant workers in the Province. As well, substantial employment is generated by the industries supporting and servicing the fishing industry.

The Nova Scotian fishing fleet ranges in size from smallest inshore vessel to the large freezer trawlers. There are well over 6,500 shore vessels up to 20 metres in length and approximately 180 offshore vessels. The two segments of the fleet have the capabilities to harvest the wide variety of species available and to ensure a continuous supply to the processing plants.

There are over 180 fish processing plants in Nova Scotia, more than 100 of which operate year-round. They range in size from the small lobster and fresh fish dealer to one of the largest and diversified fish plants in the world. While some plants specialize in particular species or types of processing, others handle a variety of products. For example, there are a large number of plants producing dried salt fish and a variety of cures and end products. Other plants process fresh and frozen groundfish fillets, frozen and cured herring products, or fresh and frozen scallops, as well as other products. High quality canned products available from Nova Scotia include canned herring in sauce and mackerel as well as lobster and queen crab.

Because of its great diversity, Nova Scotia's fishing industry can offer a wide variety of seafood products to interested buyers. Some of the larger volume products are frozen scallops, frozen groundfish fillets, live lobsters and salt dried groundfish. As well, other food products available include canned and frozen crab meat, monkfish tails, cooked and peeled shrimp, pickled gaspereaux, halibut steaks, skate wings and more. Fish meal and oil are also available as by products of the food processing operations.

As the fishing industry grows, there is considerable interest in the development of other products from traditionally fished species, as well as the processing of entirely new products from species for which a fishery is just being established. As a result, the list of Nova Scotian seafood products will lengthen over the next few years.

Nova Scotia is not only located adjacent to some of the world's best fishing grounds, it is also situated directly on the major trading route between North America and Europe. Being approximately midway between the two major markets of Central North America and Europe, shipping of Nova Scotia fishery products is done very efficiently.

Nova Scotia has excellent highway connections to other parts of North America, as well as an international airport and two large container and general cargo ports at Halifax.

The port of Halifax is one of the most modern and efficient ports in Canada with frequent liner and container service. It is also the closest to Europe in terms of sailing time of all North American terminals.

Exports of seafood through Halifax International Airport are also expanding. Direct freighter flights are scheduled from Halifax to London and Paris. Connections to other major North American and European cities are also available from Halifax via Montreal and Toronto.
